ARABIC LITERATURE IN IKIRUN (SOUTHWESTERN NIGERIA): FOCUS ON THE PROPENSITY OF ITS ‘ULAMĀ’ FOR DIDACTICISM

Introduction

The greatness of Ikirun has often been viewed by historians mainly from its position as a fortress of Ibadan army against the incursion of Fulani warriors into Yorubaland, during the Sokoto Jihad of the 19th Century. This paper attempts to show that though Ikirun served as a fortress in the olden days, it is presently a great centre of Arabic literary scholarship in Yorubaland. This study is meant to be a useful material to researchers in African studies, Yoruba history and literary scholarship. It provides information about the participation of Ikirun ‘Ulamā’ in Arabic literary activities focusing their contributions to didactic literature in Yorubaland. The paper aims at establishing the fact that rather than being a mere military fortress, Ikirun serves as rendezvous of literary ‘Ulamā’ who engage in serious literary activities Yorubaland.

Didactic writings comprise of purely religious themes such as Wa’z (exhortation) and Hikmah (gnomic) as well as Tārīkh (historical exposition) and Ta’līm (pedagogy) composed to teach an aspect or more of the religion of Islam or Arabic language. Ikirun ‘Ulamā’ make significant contribution to didacticism through their works on religious teachings, historical exposition, morality and language studies. A list of samples of didactic poems discovered in the town will be provided while two of their didactic prose writings will be reviewed.
Ikirun : The Locale of this Study

Ikirun is situated in the north-eastern part of Osun State of Nigeria. It is the headquarers of Ifelodun Local Government Area of Osun State. ’Al-Sunūsī, (192) observes that the town was founded in the fifteenth century. Ikirun had two phases of settlements, one preceding the other. The first was at Igbo-Irele, founded by Irele – a powerful hunter and herbalist from Ilare in Obokun Local Government Area of Osun State. Irele served as a provider of security for the people of Ilare, where there was another herbalist known as Ajawesola. As Irele became more popular among Ilare people, Ajawesola became envious and Irele was targeted for elimination. Irele was thereby compelled to leave Ilare and go into the bush where he built a hut for safety. The location of this new abode of Irele was known as Igbo-Irele.

The descent of Akinorun, unto whom the founding of Ikirun is ascribed has been traced to Oranmiyan. He was said to have left Ile-Ife as a prince, carrying a beaded crown. He settled temporarily with his brother- the Olugbon of Ile-Igbon in the present Egbeda Local Government Area of Oyo State. Since two brothers could not wear traditional crowns in the same town, he was compelled to advance his journey through Irawa near Oko and Ido-Osun until he finally got to Igbo-Irele where he met Irele who had already been joined there by some other people. Recognizing the royal traits in Akinorun and the fact that his hunting expeditions could not allow him to stay and manage the affairs of the expanding inhabitants of Igbo-Irele, Irele conceded the headship to Akinorun, thereby becoming the first ruler at Igbo-Irele. Akinorun gave birth to only one son named Akinbiyi, who reigned after his father at Igbo-Irele. Akinbiyi had three sons; namely: Olasinde Obaara, Akinropo and Gboleru. The settlement at Igbo-Irele was however short-lived owing to scarcity of water, famine and incessant raids and humiliations by the Ijesa Arara. The people then migrated to Reke, a village near Ilorin, under the old Oyo Empire (Coronation Committee 8-10)

After a short period at Reke, the immigrants decided to find a more suitable settlement around their former abode and in the process, they met Basetan, a brave hunter from Ila-Orangun at Idi-Iroko. Basetan welcomed them to this new location and this marked the beginning of the second phase. This new location developed into what is now known as Ikirun. The place was named Ikirun, a derivative of Akinorun, the first ruler of Igbo-Irele whose migrating inhabitants dominated the new settlement. As one of the ancient Yoruba cities, Ikirun had a bitter taste of the internecine wars, which pervaded Yorubaland in the nineteenth century. The popular Jalumi war of 1878 took place at this town. The war climaxed the attacks the town had suffered in the past. We shall not go into details about these attacks, for lack of relevance to this study and for the fact that they have been studied extensively elsewhere (Adefila 22-29; Danmole 69-87; Johnson 412-449).
Advent of Islam and the growth of Arabic scholarship in this historical town have been treated extensively in some of our previous works (Folorunsho 13-26; Folorunsho 78-88). We shall try to avoid repeating the stories here to avoid unnecessary overlapping and digression from the main thrust of our discussion here.

Arabic Didactic Poetry in Ikirun

Didacticism has been defined by Cuddon (191) as instructiveness in a literary work one of the purposes of which appears to be to give guidance, particularly in moral, ethical or religious matters. Didactic poetry and versification have been described by Abdul-Rahmon (228) as the verses composed to instruct. According to him, the term ‘didactic’ is used commonly for poetry, which teaches morals. According to Preminger (190), didactic poetry can also refer to poetry, which conveys information like astronomy, mathematics or rhetoric or systematic philosophy. Available records reveal that the composition of didactic poetry started right from the pre-Islamic days in Arabia, as noted by ’al-Fakhūrī (359), a literary historian who observes that the Arabs were not ignorant of didactic poetry right from the pre-Islamic era and they paid most attention to it.

The focus of didactic poetry in Arabic literature is the provision of instruction on religious teachings and language studies. Didactic poetry can be categorised into two. The first category consists of compositions that are in verses while the second category is known as ’al-Nazm ’al-Manthūr -versification of prose writings. The motive of the ‘Ulamā’ in these arts, as noted by Abdul-Rahmon (229) is to teach morals in form of Wa’z (exhortation) and Hikmah (gnomic) or to teach certain principles of Islam or Arabic language in a mode more appealing to sentiment. Writing on the magnitude of Arabic didactic poetry in Nigeria, Kobi – Bauchi (132) notes:

If we put all the poetic compositions of the Nigerian ‘Ulamā’ together we will realize that the didactic poetry consumes the lion share, as the ‘Ulamā’ compose on all academic disciplines….

The above quotation reveals the preponderance of didactic compositions in the of Arabic poetry of Nigerian ‘Ulamā’. In justification of the magnitude of this genre, Hunwick (217) submits that:

The Islamic teaching tradition is a strong one in Nigeria and the need for texts for students was always great. Importing manuscripts copies from North Africa or Egypt was expensive... Evidently responding to local needs, teachers then made summaries of certain of these imported texts; ... they also versified some of them using the didactic metre (‘al-Rajaz). to facilitate rote learning. These versifications were sometimes amplified in commentaries by later generations.

Production of didactic poems began in the seventeenth century in Hausaland. Of the surviving works of that century, according to Ahmed (59) is Majzarat ‘al-fityān, a didactic rajaz poem of forty-eight lines composed by the celebrated Muhammad ‘al-Kashnāwī best known by his sobriquet Ibn ‘al-Sabbāgh. The century also witnessed the production of ‘Atiyyat ‘al-mu’tī, a long poem on Islamic piety by ‘Abd ‘Allāh b. Muhammad b. ‘Abd ‘al-Salām best known by his sobriquet Thiqah or Suka( Ahmed 60).

Furthermore, the eighteenth century witnessed an increase in the production of didactic poems. For instance, Shaykh ‘Abd ‘al-Rahmān ‘al-Barnāwī wrote many jurisprudential works in verse while Tahir b. ‘Ibrāhīm ‘al-Fallātī wrote his own works on both religious and language studies(Yahya 178,185). Shaykh ‘Abd ‘al-Rahmān ‘al-Barnāwī (d. 1755) wrote Shurb ‘al-zulāl, a one hundred and twenty-three verse poem on Islamic jurisprudence (Bivar and Hiskett 118). According to Hunwick (215) ‘Al-Barnāwī could also be credited with ‘al-Kawkab ‘al-durfī fī nazm mā jā’ fī ‘al-’akhdārī, a verisification of an original prose work written by a north African scholar of the sixteenth century ‘Abd ‘al-Rahmān ‘al-’Akhdārī Some other prominent contributors to didactic writings during that century included Shaykh Tāhir b. ‘Ibrāhīm ‘al-Fallātī (d. 1776) whose writings embraced both religious and language studies. To the credit of this scholar were ‘al-Manzūmah ‘al-kubrā, a one hundred and thirty line versification of ‘Abū ‘Abd ‘Allāh Muhammad b. Yūsuf Shua’yb ‘al-Sunūsi’s ‘Aqīdat ‘ahl ‘al-tawhīd and ‘al-durar ‘al-lawāmi’ which comprises seven hundred and ninety-eight lines based on Lāmiyat ‘al-’af’āl of Ibn Mālik, a very popular treatise on morphology among West African scholars (Jamiu 8). The pre-nineteenth century Arabic literature and that of the Jihād of Ibn Fūdī in the nineteenth century concentrated mainly on didactic works with religious undertone.

The nineteenth century also witnessed an upsurge in the production of didactic works not only in prose but also in verse with the emergence of the reformist Fulani scholars. Shaykh ‘Uthmān b. Fūdī (d.1817), his brother ‘Abd ‘Allāh (d. 1826) and his son Muhammad Bello (d. 1837) on the Arabic literary scene. They contributed a great deal of didactic works to linguistics, historical and religious studies. Abubakre (317) observes that the participation of Yoruba ‘Ulamā’ in the cultivation of this genre which was pioneered by ‘Ahmad b. ‘Abūbakri, Omo-Ikoko of Ilorin, with his ’Itiqāt ‘al-mutūn min khamsat funūn was a by-product of the textbooks available unto them in the process of teaching and learning of Arabic education and its allied disciplines. Also notable is the influence of the literary heritage of the nineteenth century Hausaland on these ‘Ulamā’.
Didacticism occupies a pride of place within the educational system of Yoruba ‘Ulamā’ and indeed Ikirun in particular, considering the significant contributions of its ‘Ulamā’ to this genre. Their didactic contributions are predominantly in poetry with significant volumes also in prose. They did not dabble into versification of prose writings.

Islam is the main subject matter of the didactic writings of Ikirun ‘Ulamā’ especially their poetry. Aspects covered in their poems include theology, morality, jurisprudence and general exhortations. None of their poems embraces language studies. This is probably because language studies is a highly specialised and technical area which does not leave much room for innovative interpretations and display of narrative capabilities as do areas like history, religious studies or even letter-writing(Yahya 176). The only didactic writing on language studies so far discovered in the town is in prose and the writing is reviewed briefly in this paper.

Few of the didactic poems identified by Folorunsho (78-88) in Ikirun are the following

1. Qasīdat hamidtu ‘Allāh composed by 'Ahmad Tijānī Salāh ‘al-Dīn (103 lines)
2. Fā‘datun ‘amīmah fi‘al‘-indhār wa‘al‘-irshād composed by ‘Abd ‘al-Rashīd Muhammad Jāmi’ (140 lines, comprising 28 Qīṭ’ah of 5 lines each).
3. Khudh ‘al-nasīḥah composed by ’Ahmad Tijānī Salāḥ ‘al-Dīn (75 lines)
4. ‘Al-Hīwār composed by Mustafā Jumu‘ah Adewale (18 lines)
5. Qasīdat Allahu lī composed by ‘Ahmad Tijānī Salāḥ ‘al-Dīn (70 lines)
7. Nasīḥ ‘al‘-ikhwān composed by ’Ahmad Tijānī Salāḥ ‘al-Dīn (40 lines)
8. Sh‘r ‘al-wa‘z wa‘al‘-irshād composed by Bashīr Mustafā Hasan (32 lines)

Didactic Prose Writings

Abrams and Harpham (79) expand the scope of didacticism to all writings that are instructive, either in prose or in verses. According to them:

The adjective ‘didactic’ which means ‘intended to give instruction’ is applied to works of literature that are designed to expound a branch of knowledge, or else to embody, in imaginative or fictional form, a moral, religious or philosophical doctrine or theme
While discussing the cultivation of didacticism in the Arabic works in Yorubaland, greater attention is always paid to their poetry probably because they have more didactic poems than prose works. Hunwick (215) has categorized Arabic scholarly writings, especially the Arabic prose in Nigeria into a number of broad categories; research and teaching (didactic), polemical, devotional and secular. An observation of the Arabic literary productions of Ikirun 'Ulamā’ shows their significant contributions to all the listed categories. Their prose writings falling under research and teaching include Misbāh 'Al-Zamān li ‘l-‘akābir wa ‘l-ghīlmān by 'Ismā'īl Nibrās ‘Al-‘Adab b. Yūsuf, Miṣfāṭ ‘l-‘Hadīth by Mustafā Zughūl b. ‘al-Sunūsī and 'Al-Mawrid ‘Al-‘Adhb fi ‘l-fann ‘Al-‘Arūd wa ‘l-Qāfiyah by Bashīr Mustafā Hasan. Others in this category are Masājid nayjiriyyah tahta ‘al-kāshīfah and ‘Al-Tall ‘Al-Muballal, both by Mustafā Jumu’ah Adewale and ‘Ibrāhīm Jumu’ah Adewale’s Tashīl ‘Al-Su’ūbāt fi ‘Ilm ‘Al-Mirāth. Under this category are also ‘Āmantu bi-‘llah by Yūnus ‘al-Sunūsī, Tazyīn ‘Al-Nadwah by Muhibb Allah ‘Ali Shi’tah and ‘Al-Fawz ‘Al-Kabīr fi ‘Ulām ‘Al-Tasfīr by Hamzah Husayn ‘Al-Dahhāk. Five of the didactic prose works of Shaykh Ya’qūb ‘al-Mukhtar are ‘Al-Sab’ ‘Al-Mathānī, Mawā ‘iz balīghah min Zubūr Sayyidīnā Dōwūd, Khamsūna Farīdah, Nahī ‘Al-Nāhīn, and Hīdāyat ‘al-muta’abidīn (Folorunsho 78-88).

We have selected two of these writings, namely Miṣfāṭ ‘l-‘Hadīth by Mustafā Zughūl b. ‘al-Sunūsī and ‘Al-Mawrid ‘Al-‘Adhb fi ‘l-fann ‘Al-‘Arūd wa ‘l-Qāfiyah by Bashīr Mustafā Hasan for review in this paper.

Miṣfāṭ ‘al-hadīth of Mustafā Zughūl b. ‘al-Sunūsī

It is a 62-page work written in fine Arabic prose on the technique of Hadīth criticism and verification by Shaykh Mustafā Zughūl b. ‘al-Sunūsī, an Ikirun-born erudite scholar and prolific writer, who established the famous citadel of Arabic and Islamic learning known as Dāru-d-da’wah wa ‘l-‘Irshād in Isolo, Lagos. It contains a foreword, introduction, eleven chapters and a bibliography. It was published by Dār Lubnān at Beirut in 1967. His approach in the work is historical, giving a deeper insight into the growth of ‘Ilm ‘al-hadīth. Commenting on the work, Abubakre (318) says:

This work, entitled miftāhu ‘al-hadīth, is nearly an exhaustive study of the biographies of the major authorities and sources of hadith literature in sunni Islam, and it is written tersely in just sixty-two pages.

Of all the Arabic prose writings from Ikirun, especially the ones falling under the teaching and research category, this is the only text written in conformity with a school syllabus as stressed by the author who was a tutor at Markaz ‘al-ta’līm ‘al-‘arabī ‘al-‘islamī, established by Shaykh ‘Adam Abdullah ‘Al-‘Ilūrī in Agege, when the text was published. In the introduction, the author writes;
I compiled it as a prescribed text particularly for the students of secondary classes at Markaz 'al-ta'lim 'al-'arabī 'al-'islāmī, at Agege, Nigeria and for the seekers of knowledge in general. I pray the Almighty to make it an illuminating lamp from which the old and young seekers of 'ilm 'al-hadīth will benefit ('Al-Sunūsī 7).

Hadīth, being the second source of Islamic jurisprudence, the knowledge of its growth and development is indispensable towards a proper grasp of the teaching of Islam. The book portrays the author’s wide exposition to history, the knowledge of which he effectively manipulates to establish his submissions. His thorough grounding in Arabic language is also evidenced in the freedom of his expression from obscurities and effective usage of the language.

Miftāh 'al-hadīth is divided into eleven chapters. The first chapter is introductory. It features the definition of technical terms associated with the science of hadīth such as 'Ilm 'al-riwāyah, 'Ilm 'al-dirāayah, 'al-Khabar, 'al-Sanad, 'al-Musnad, 'al-Jarh wa'al-ta'dīl and designations of hadīth transmitters. The second chapter traces the evolution and growth of hadīth. According to the author, the compilation of hadīth was initiated by Caliph 'Umar b. 'Abd 'al-'Azīz, about a hundred years after the death of the Prophet through an order given to 'Imam 'al-Zuhrī Muhammad b. Shihāb. The third chapter examines the contributions of the Prophet’s companions, to the growth of the science of hadīth. Two categories of sahābah were identified, the muqillūn (those who transmitted less than one thousand 'ahādīth) and the mukthirūn (those who transmitted more than one thousand 'ahādīth). Of the first category were 'Abūbakri 'al-Siddīq, 'Umar b. 'al-Khattāb, 'Uthmān b. 'Affān and 'Ālī b. 'Abī Tālib. Seven of the sahābah featured under the second category were 'Abū Hurayrah, 'Abd Allāh b. 'Umar, 'Anas b. Mālik, 'Abd 'Allāh b. 'Abdus Sa'id b. 'Abd-Allāh b. 'Al-Khudrī and Jābir b. 'Abd 'Allāh. The fourth chapter focuses on the role of tābi‘ūn (successors to the sahābah), in the documentation and preservation of hadīth. Of these, Sa'id b. Musayyib, 'Uways 'al-Qarnī, 'Al-Hasan 'al-Hasan al-Basrī, Ibn. Shihāb 'al-Zuhrī, 'Ibn. 'Al-Nakh'ī, 'Urwah b. Zubayr and Muhammad b. Sirīn were acknowledged for their invaluable contributions.

In the fifth chapter, the author discusses the lives and contributions of the founders of the four schools of Islamic jurisprudence to 'Ilm 'al-hadīth. The sixth chapter is also historical and it traces the life and career, as well as the character of the various persons constituting the links in the chains of different transmitted hadīth. Chapter seven is devoted to the six canonical collections known as 'al-Sihāh 'alsittah. In addition to the biographical accounts of the compilers of these collections, their roles are also examined. Miftāḥ 'al-ḥadīth shows that these men obviously used a critical technique of selection to decide what they would include and what they would not. Their purpose was to assemble a body of traditions, which would serve as a rule of life for practising Muslims, so their primary interest was in selecting such traditions as would give clear guidance to the Muslims (Doi 14). Chapter eight discusses the lexicons written on ḥadīth. 'Arba‘ūn ḥadīthan, ‘the forty ḥadīth’ is discussed in chapter nine while the transmitters whose names featured in the forty ḥadīth were assessed in the tenth chapter. Scholars have divided the ḥadīth into three categories according to the degree of their reliability. This classification is the main focus of the eleventh chapter. It discusses the three classification of ḥadīth, namely saḥīh (sound) hasan (good) and da‘īf (weak).

'Al-Mawrid 'al-‘adhb fi fann 'al-‘arūd wa 'al-qāfyyah of Bashīr Mustafā Hasan

This work is a 58-page didactic work on 'al-'Arūd (Arabic prosody) authored by Shaykh Bashīr Mustafā Hasan. It is selected for review because it is the only published prose text devoted to the teaching of Arabic metrics so far discovered in Ikirun. Al-Mawrid was designed to be in two volumes.

The work is divided into an introduction, fifteen short chapters and a conclusion. Stressing the motive for writing of this book, the author states:

I wrote it (the book) having noted the lukewarm attitude of learners to this discipline in spite of its simplicity. I have simplified it with citation of appropriate illustrations, using simple Arabic expression (Hasan 2)

The first volume used for the present study was published in 1996 by 'Al-Maktab 'al-'arabī li 'al-khattāt wa 'al-tibā‘ah, Osogbo, while the second volume had not been published as at the time of completion of this paper. It contains an introduction, fifteen chapters and a conclusion. Stressing the motive for the writing of the book is the focus of the introduction. There, the author claims that the need to simplify this branch of Arabic studies inspired him to write the book. The first chapter is also introductory. It defines 'al-'Arūd (prosody) and explains the benefits that could be derived from learning and mastering it. The second chapter examines the evolution of prosody, tracing it to Khalīl b. 'Ahmad 'al-Farāhīdī in the eighth century. He argues that though some sources affirm that the composition of Arabic poems predated the period of Khalīl b. 'Ahmad 'al-Farāhīdī, yet the credit of laying down the metrical rules goes to 'al-Farāhīdī, whose codification of these metres since the eighth century has remained substantially unchanged.
Khalīl b. ’Ahmad ʿal-Farāḥīdī, the precursor of Arabic prosody established fifteen metres, while ʿAbū ʿal-Hasan Saʿīd b. Masʿādah ʿal-ʿAkhfash added the sixteenth. The components of these metres are discussed in the third chapter. In the fourth chapter, the discussion centres on how Arabic poem could be composed in consonance with the prosodic metres, citing appropriate illustrations. Some prosodic terms such as ʿal-Bayt - verse of poem, ʿal-Shatr - an hemistich or half-line (each verse of a normal poem consists of two hemistiches), ʿal-Sadr - (i.e. the first hemistich), ʿal-ʿAjuz – (i.e. the second hemistich), ʿal-ʿArūd - the last foot of the first hemistich and ʿal-Qāfiyah - the rhyme or the last foot of the second hemistich, are examined in the fifth chapter.

The sixth chapter treats metrical variations and irregularities that can affect the soundness of lines consequent upon the alteration of the metres. Types of verses are briefly mentioned in chapter seven while the eighth chapter centres on Darīrāt ʿal-shīʿr, (poetic licences). It discusses such unavoidable errors in poetical poetry which may arise when a poet is constrained, by the exigencies of metre or rhyme, to make some slight changes (Wright 373).

The sixteen classical metres feature in chapter nine. Chapters ten to fifteen treat six of these metres namely ʿal-Tawīl, ʿal-Madīd, ʿal-Bāṣīt, ʿal-Wāfīr, ʿal-Kāmil and ʿal-Hazaj in that order. While the remaining ten metres are expected to be treated in the second volume, the ones treated here are illustrated with relevant samples. The book is brought to an end with a conclusion, raising the hope of the readers on getting the remaining metres in the second volume, which has remained unpublished as at the time of preparation of this paper.

Conclusion

As one of the prominent battlefields during the period of the internecine wars in Yorubaland, Ikirun has often been viewed by historians mainly from its position as a fortress. Its position as the fortress of Ibadan army against the incursion of Fulani warriors into Yorubaland during the Sokoto Jihād of the 19th century acquired a great status for it in Yoruba history. This paper has revealed the status of Ikirun as a great centre of Arabic literary scholarship in Yorubaland. It established the fact that rather than being a mere military fortress, Ikirun could be seen as a rendezvous of literary ʿUlamāʾ with immense contributions to literary activities Yorubaland. The contributions of these ʿUlamāʾ embraced variety of genres out of which the didactics engaged our attention in this paper.

Арабская литература Икируна (Юго-Западная Нигерия): Исследование тенденции «Улама» для дидактизма

Майкл Адегиси Фолораншо
Университет Осун, Нигерия

Критики литературы уделяли мало внимания роли Усмана Улама (арабских ученых) в развитии арабской науки в Йоруба. Статья посвящена литературным произведениям, созданным учеными Улама и их дидактическими образами письма. В то же время социальные и культурные факторы, определяющие развитие арабского алфавита, арабские рукописи, собранные в поселении, были критически проанализированы как историческими, так и контекстуальными методами. Для изучения предмета литературных произведений использовался метод анализа содержания.

В статье подчеркивается, что Улугин внес большой вклад в религиоведы, особенно религиозные уроки, исторические экспозиции, мораль и уроки языка. Наряду с тем, что арабская армия являлась военной армией, Йоруба - это арабский научный центр.
